

Conservative tables EDM on particle physics

Shadow minister for innovation, universities and skills Adam Afriyie has called on the government to examine the effects of the current funding crisis in particle physics research on the capacity and international reputation of UK science. In an early day motion tabled in the House of Commons on 3 March, he regrets the proposed job cuts at university and research council laboratories and urges the government to include the international impact of the changes within the remit of the Wakeham committee review of physics research.
